Despite the lack of a national climate change law in the United States, there has been a great deal of action on climate policy. In response to congressional gridlock on climate change, policy action has moved to the states, the courts, the executive branch, collaboration, and appropriations politics. This talk gives an overview of this dynamic over the last decade.